The screenshot shows the Mozilla Firefox website. The main heading is 'The new Firefox' with the sub-heading 'Meet Firefox Quantum. Fast for good.' There is a 'Download now' button and a 'Firefox Privacy Notice' link. The browser's address bar shows 'Mozilla Corporation (US)' and the page is viewed at 80% zoom.

The screenshot shows a Udemy course page for 'Cucumber BDD with Python Behave and Selenium WebDriver'. The course is priced at 'Free' (originally $499.99, 100% off) with '2 days left at this price'. It includes an 'Add to cart' button and an 'Enroll now' button. The course description includes: 'Build Automation Framework with Cucumber BDD using Python and Behave for Selenium WebDriver and API Testing on Demo Site'. The 'What you'll learn' section lists several skills, such as creating a Cucumber BDD testing framework and working on a full E-commerce site.

We have created new browser instances for browser, then they switched to each of the function so that the test runs on all three browsers! Funny eh? Subsequently, we need to install a picture to allow us to work with the selenium from the internal node. The most popular environments have a package or a framework that will install WebDriver and the associations needed to communicate with WebDriver using this language, such as Java, C #, Ruby, Python, JavaScript (node), etc. Since you are using these twice now, you may want to create a couple of Helper variables to store them. Update the second block of code (which starts with Let Driver = ...) as so let drivers = new WebDriver.Builder (). ForBrowser ('Firefox') .UsingServer ('http: // localhost: 4444 / WD / hub ') .build (); Run your test, and you should see it run as expected; This time however you run it on the standalone server: à €
